--Brothers Roberto and Alejandro Mejia, who wrestled as La Parkita (I think the original from AAA 15 years ago, not the one on AAA in recent years) and Espectro II, were both found dead near Arena Coliseo yesterday in a hotel room. The police believe they went to Room 52 of Hotel Moderno with two prostitutes at 6 p.m. Sunday night. The manager went to the room on Monday when they hadn't checked out, nobody answered the door, and when they opened the door to clean the room, both bodies were found in bed and were dead. The belief is they were drugged and robbed by the prostitutes, as none of their belongings were found. Both were 35. They are both younger brothers of the original Espectrito, who was the superstar mini with Mascara Sagrada from the early days of AAA. La Parkita had wrestled in the U.S. with CHIKARA.

--Jakks Pacific and THQ, which own the WWE video game license that expires at the end of this year, are claiming they are exercising their option to renew for five years. Part of this is based on a legal action between Jakks Pacific and THQ over publishing any video games based on wrestling during the current contract. It's an interesting interpretation as to whether or not that would include the UFC game and if it was based on wrestling.

--Adam Lash on The Daily Show had Mike Kim, author of escaping North Korea, and he mentioned government excesses including spending $15 million to bring pro wrestling to the country (that would be the two 1995 New Japan shows at May Day Stadium in Pyongyang, which drew the two largest crowds in pro wrestling history, including 170,000 for Ric Flair vs. Antonio Inoki and 150,000 for Shinya Hashimoto vs. Scott Norton).
